BACKGROUND

Economic growth is an increase in the capacity of an economy to produce goods and services, from one period to another period. But Economists have always known that the process of economic growth is not only aggregate, but entails deep structural changes over time. It is also observed that growth of any country invariably brings with it the structural transformation. This transformation involves shifts in resource allocation from primary to secondary to tertiary activities in a wider perspective.

A good number of theories exist that explains how sectors are endogenously created and what happens to their distribution along the path of economic growth. Recent decades have seen a dramatic increase in research on economic growth and development. There is still need to deliberate on the various issues related to Economics growth and structural changes in order to harness the opportunities available as also face the challenges and be prepared with the proactive approach to combat these issues of varying complexities.

Through this Conference, various issues concerning Economics growth and structural changes shall be raised and it would hopefully arrive at a prudent and logical conclusion which policy makers could use as guiding principles at various levels of planning and decision making.
